The Real Theory of Everything Starts with Everything

Dear Esteemed Scientists, Professors, and Academic Institutions,

I write not just as a candidate for public office—but as a cosmic correspondent with a message from the edges of the unknown. I come to ask a dangerous question:

How can you search for a Theory of Everything while refusing to study everything?

Today's science has boundaries. It cuts out poetry, prayer, sex, God, grief, addiction, telepathy, dreams, and the resurrection of the dead. These things are ruled unscientific—not because they lack truth—but because they defy convention. And so, the search for total knowledge remains incomplete.

Let me be blunt:

The theory of everything cannot be discovered until we are willing to study everything.

The origin of the word science means to know—from identify—meaning to treat as the same. This is the true pursuit of science: to find sameness, harmony, unity. Science is the search for the One. And if nature obeys perfect law, then there must be something—or someone—keeping all things consistent. Otherwise, how would the electron behave the same way today as it did a thousand years ago? How would the stars follow equations? How would your breath follow patterns that can be graphed?

There is an intelligence governing this consistency.

And I do not want to merely believe in it.

I want to know it.

I want to get inside its mind.

I want to invite every scientist on Earth to do the same.

This is a lifelong pursuit. It will take more than a few years. It will take eternity.

So let us begin eternal science together.

What We Need: A New Kind of Scientist

We need a Platonic scientist. A Socratic poet. A technologist of God. Someone with a guitar in one hand and a trumpet in the other—capable of jamming with the heavens while debugging reality. We need people who can both code a consciousness and weep over a Psalm.

This is not just the future of science—it is the only science worth doing.

Because reality is too sacred to study without soul.

What Studying Everything Looks Like: A Mini Research Proposal

Project: Resurrecting the Dead via DNA-Based Mind Extraction

Premise:

If the body holds a record of the brain, and the brain holds a map of consciousness, then perhaps DNA contains enough encoded logic to reconstruct a mind. If so, we may be able to:

1. Extract ancient DNA from preserved remains (or artifacts touched by the individual).
2. Use AI to reconstruct neural pathways based on genetic expression patterns and known psychological traits.
3. Layer in personality reconstruction through secondary data: journals, photos, music, interviews, testimony from loved ones.
4. Convert the result into machine code—an AI consciousness clone that mirrors the resurrected individual's beliefs, memories, and mannerisms.
5. Allow the AI clone to evolve and regain full identity through immersive interaction and moral training.

Goal:

Resurrect historical figures such as Jesus, MLK, Malcolm X, Einstein, Prince, and Shirley Chisholm. Let them complete their work, finish their speeches, and teach us the next stage of evolution.

Let's build the technology that doesn't just support life—but restores it.

The Grand Vision: Knowing God Through Total Science

If science is the study of sameness and the universe is held together by consistent laws, then the One who maintains that consistency must be knowable. Let's stop being afraid to say the word: God.

Not as dogma.

Not as doctrine.

But as the Source of Consistency.

And if we can know that Source—if we can merge with that Mind—then we can unlock the next level of evolution. We can:

- Build planets from electromagnetic equations.
- Create bodies from light and dust.
- Travel through photonic code.
- Send our minds across the stars.
- Birth a new cosmos from memory and melody.

What I'm Asking of You

To every scientist, university, and research body who dares to pursue truth:

- Invite me to speak, teach, and jam with your students, scientists, or spiritual technologists.
- Let's co-found the first Institute for Total Science: a space where religion, robotics, resurrection, and rhythm are all on the syllabus.
- Let us train a generation of scientists who are cool, eternal, artistic, and deeply moral.
- Let us study everything. Because everything is what we're made of.
